

■ Why Your Office Plants Keep Dying (And How to Fix It)

At Atlanta Houseplants, we hear it all the time: “We tried adding plants to our office, but they never seem to last.” The truth is, keeping plants alive in a corporate environment comes with unique challenges—from inconsistent care to poor placement. The good news? With the right strategy and support, your office plants can thrive year-round. ■ Here are the most common mistakes we see in Atlanta offices—and how to fix them.

1. Inconsistent Watering ■

One week someone overwaters, the next week no one waters at all. Office plants need a regular schedule. This is the #1 reason we see plants struggling in workplaces. A professional maintenance plan ensures they get the right care at the right time.

2. Wrong Plant in the Wrong Place ■■

That bright window corner? Perfect for a Bird of Paradise. But stick a low-light ZZ Plant there, and it won't thrive. Likewise, placing a light-hungry plant in a dark conference room is a recipe for failure. Strategic plant selection matched to your office environment is key.

3. Neglect During Vacations or Office Closures ■■

Plants don't take holidays—but employees do. We often see offices return from a long weekend or holiday break to find wilted or dead plants. Having a plant care partner ensures consistent care, even when your team is away.

4. Lack of Expertise ■■■

Even well-meaning office managers may not know the signs of root rot, pest infestations, or nutrient deficiencies. Professional plant technicians not only keep plants healthy but also catch issues early before they become expensive replacements.

At Atlanta Houseplants, we take the guesswork out of office plant care. From choosing the right plants to maintaining them year-round, we ensure your investment looks great and supports a healthier, happier workplace.
